Introduction and Conclusion. INTRODUCTIONS. The introduction of a paper must introduce its thesis and not just its topic.

Readers will lose some—if not much—of what the paper says if the introduction does not prepare them for what is coming (and tell them what to look for and how to evaluate it). For example, an introduction that says, “The British army fought in the battle of Saratoga” gives the reader virtually no guidance about the paper’s thesis (i.e., what the paper concludes ...
